The e-commerce giant is well aware and has acknowledged that fake reviews are a problem. It removes and sometimes sues offenders. However, it struggles to rein in coordinated efforts outside of its website that are organized to flood product listings with good reviews in quid pro quo schemes. The schemes are remarkably common, and Amazon has kicked successful companies off its marketplace for breaking the rules. In May of last year, it removed listings for electronics sold by Aukey and Mpow amid reports the companies had engaged in incentivized reviews. Amazon also says it puts resources into removing fake reviews and the accounts that post them, adding that it blocked 200 million suspected fake reviews before they were posted in 2020. A company spokesperson said 99% of Amazon's actions on incentivized reviews take place proactively, that is, before problems are reported to the company.

Since positive reviews are so central to sellers' successes, Amazon's ban on reviews in exchange for refunds aims to keep these reviews trustworthy. After buying a product based on positive reviews, an honest shopper might get recruited for a fake review scheme in a couple of different ways. In the first scenario, the product arrives in the Amazon smile box, and the customer notices a card with a QR code or a website printed on it. This is so common no shopper would blink, and the link might lead to a regular customer support website that's above board.

Step 3

Sometimes multiple brands use the same group to trawl for reviewers. Once shoppers are in this world, they might receive private messages or friend requests from unrelated companies looking for more people to review their products.
