Every sportsbook offers money line markets for just about every matchup imaginable, so it won't be hard to find a place to wager.

You might want to shop at a few different sportsbooks, however, because the odds could be different depending on the book.

For example, you could find a favorite at -150 at one book and -160 at another. Or you could find an underdog at +200 at one book instead of +195 at another. When is the money line the better option than the point spread? Well, there can be a number of situations in which the money line is more of a value play. 5 points on the point spread, for example, why not simply take the money line for a larger payout? No matter the point spread, if you feel great about an underdog winning outright then you might as well bet on the money line to get a larger return.

At the same time, if you feel great about a favorite winning outright but are nervous about them covering the spread, the money line can once again be an appealing option.

Whatever your play, just like with any market be sure to do research on team and player news, head-to-head history of a particular matchup and everything else that helps you make more informed decisions.
